A: Pass the data as a GET query string parameter: test Battery power is increasingly used in mobile devices to generate electrical energy for supplying power to the devices' internal circuitry and powering the devices' display screens. This is particularly true in mobile devices with limited battery capacity, such as a laptop computer. Often, in mobile devices with limited battery capacity, a rechargeable battery must be recharged periodically. A mobile device, such as a laptop computer, often includes one or more rechargeable batteries that supply a particular amount of power to an internal computer when the battery is charging and the internal computer is either on or executing. A mobile device typically includes a power management module to manage the mobile device's power by limiting or restricting the power supplied to the mobile device's internal circuitry (for example, by turning off the internal circuitry) when the battery is charging and the mobile device is executing. The power management module periodically polls the battery to determine if the battery is charging, and if so, the power management module interrupts the execution of the mobile device's internal circuitry and begins to monitor the charging process.
