Adobe Photoshop Elements: The application that Adobe produces for those who don't want to shell out the cash for the full Photoshop application. Photoshop Elements is a great little program that allows you to create basic raster images. You can even edit existing images in Photoshop Elements. However, you have a limit of 4GB of storage on your hard drive. You can purchase your own copy of Photoshop Elements if you want to store more than 4GB on your own computer. Don't think you have to shell out for the full Photoshop program to use Photoshop Elements—that's not true.

GIMP: A free, cross-platform raster image editor that many graphic designers swear by. GIMP is good for basic image manipulation. While you may get out of the GIMP program what you put into it, working with the GIMP program can be a fun and rewarding experience.

Corel PaintShop Pro: Another raster image editor. Many photographers use this program to work with various photo styles, such as black-and-white, sepia, and so on. Corel PaintShop Pro also includes image-editing functions; however, it's not as powerful as Photoshop.

Planning for Color: Adobe RGB and sRGB When you save an image or import a photo, color accuracy is the first thing you'll likely need to address. Because most images have color spaces beyond the sRGB (standard Red Green Blue) color space, many people employ Adobe RGB color spaces. You'll need to know the differences between these color spaces before you can do anything else.

artek and CAME) feel brand spanking new. IT looks as if O2 is playing hardball against all its partners. I've now been told it's no longer possible to use my phone with them, or at least not in the same way as before. That appears to include paying for data use through their app, rather than getting it for free in my monthly allowance as before, using one of the best SIM-only deals on the market. I've been told that the best I can get is four hours of talk time, but that means £20 a month. All that contrasts with Orange, which is offering 25 hours a month at no extra cost, and paying £10 a month for the privilege of using it with others. That's not a problem, unless you want others to be using your phone as well, in which case you'd need more than four hours a month. I'm sure C-wire is the same, and that ends up as 50p a day; it's a small price to pay, if you'd rather have a friend to call. This may be what O2 is telling its partners, but it could just be that it wants to make more money than it was getting from its partners. Given O2's main source of revenue from customers (through charging them for phone calls and messaging services), making calls and texts cheaper would be great. But are we expecting the mobile phone companies to be nice and generous just because we happen to be paying them a fee? In the same way that mobile operators don't like the idea of having to pay people to use their networks, for instance, I'm sure they wouldn't like being forced to subsidise someone's phone bills. One thing is for sure: O2 won't be finding it easy to obtain extra spectrum for 4G, and that might mean that the tech companies will have to take the hit and subsidise network costs. The irony of that is that the only network ever to restrict the number of customers that individual resellers could sell, was a company called 3 (which is now EasyPhone). However, that was back in the days when the telecoms regulator was so busy fighting to keep a monopoly on the market, it couldn't see how it was damaging consumers. That's where the money is now, and so the regulator has suddenly found it worth preserving in the UK. We now

EasyJet cuts flights to and from Tel Aviv, Jerusalem The decision to cancel flights to and from Tel Aviv and Jerusalem will cost airlines more than $800,000 (£566,000), according to the travel websites Skyscanner and Google Flights. From next January, British airline easyJet will no longer fly to these two Israeli cities. Previously it has operated flights to Tel Aviv but the loss of this route is expected to have a dramatic impact on the firm's finances, according to analysts. easyJet has been looking at its route network for
