Which leads to the most important observation. The Japanese have been producing important quantities of Japanese manga, comics and animation for almost the entire period that anime has been recorded. We are often smugly confident that "Japanese companies do not know how to make anime". But they already do, indeed they have been doing it for more than 60 years. Japanese video game and music is often praised as being more sophisticated and even "Japanese-ness" in its fluid creation. A more exact measure of genuine success in Japan - especially for cultural exports - may be to ask - how long will it take for a non-Japanese, here, at the time of the release, to produce a Japanese-ness equivalent? And I am very doubtful. The cultural question will of course start with the release of Japanese video games and music in America. The success of the next "Japanese game" will be the best measure of the "Japanese-ness" of that game. Japan's culture has also been about a prolonged "battle to the death" to be the best in everything. But this is not just a Japanese battle for "best". It is much more an intercontinental battle of "best" for superior culture. The point is that the Japanese have at least a $40 billion industry that creates the world's best products. In fact if you watch the production of the new "Japanese game" for the next ten years you can fairly say this will be the best ever. Overall, Japan has produced the best game in the world and is now clearly moving to Asia, which is the biggest game market now. On top of that, as the size of the Japanese domestic game market starts to increase dramatically in the next 5 years (currently at

A film of a size equal to 120-times 120 mm in diagonal is generally used in the art of the liquid crystal display device. Therefore, it is impossible for this type of liquid crystal display device to be made thinner. For this reason, there has been developed a liquid crystal display device in which a liquid crystal panel is bonded with a transparent resin film as a protection film. The liquid crystal display device with the transparent protection film is provided in such a manner that the peripheral portion of the liquid crystal panel is sealed with the transparent resin film. Conventionally, a transparent resin film as a protection film is formed in an integral manner from a long film with an endless shape. By sandwiching the integral resin film with the liquid crystal panel and cutting off the peripheral portion of the resin film along a direction normal to the surface of the liquid crystal panel, a liquid crystal display device is formed. In the conventional production method of liquid crystal display device with a transparent resin film as a protection film, there arises a problem that there is some residue of a protective resin film on the bonding portion of the liquid crystal panel and the transparent resin film, and the bonding portion is defective. This problem becomes more serious if the liquid crystal display device having a large area is produced and if the liquid crystal display device is subjected to a continuous operation. For example, JP 7-20962 A (1995) discloses a production method of a thin liquid crystal display device, in which a liquid crystal display device is formed by bonding a liquid crystal panel with a transparent resin film. In this production method of a thin liquid crystal display device, a protective resin film is formed on a liquid crystal panel. After that, the protective resin film is cut off along a direction normal to the surface of the liquid crystal panel by a blade to form a transparent resin film as a protection film. This transparent resin film
