" I had not seen so much as a squirming piece of crust before. During the course of our two or three hours' ramble we had already taken in the place where the late battle had been fought; we had seen the river, the three-cornered plain, and the position where the British had been beaten back; we had climbed the hill that overlooks the plain, and we had seen the place where, later on, a further charge was made, in the afternoon, upon the French pickets, who lined the river bank. This last point we would have visited at any time, and yet the time seemed to have been snatched away and condemned to death in the grave, as it were. There was room for no one but a ferocious hater of war, nor, it seemed to us, was there room in the place for either war lover or lover of peace. It was worse than Belgium; there the place was formally consecrated to the memories of the many who died in the fierce battle, and somehow the spot seemed to us as sacred as the churchyard. But over there the place had been merely used; there had been none of this ceremony of owning and taking possession. There had been no consecration or dedication of the place, as if it were little better than any other bit of open ground, to play among what use or what sort of use we liked best. But there it was; and as I had told George when I told him to get me a bottle of wine, I would go quietly up and have it said over me and work it out by me as well. It made me feel bad to think of that low place of last resort down to the "dead pop'n'splats," while the spot where we were, at that moment, was a fairly good place, over there. "It's all right," I thought to myself, "since it's at all, it will all come out all right, if I know it. I'll only have enough of it; and I'll take all the chances, and the chances that count most. If they'll have me at all, they'll have me for keeps. It'll be over in a few days, and then the rest'll come and see me, and thank me, and say that it was I that got them
