shot has been almost extinct since 1984 in the NBA. The only place you see it is in the NBA D-League. But, it was still not secure. Only the most gifted of the game's best could even attempt the shot. But, a great shooter just got better. [Read: The Golden Age of the Three-Point Shooters and the Decline of the Jump Shot] The success of those who had the skill helped spread the three point shot to college basketball and professional basketball. The three point shooter was now an established position. The shooting guard had established himself as a playmaker and the small forward was a stretch four and a driving force in the paint. And, in 1999 the quick guard had taken control. [Read: LeBron James: Five Greatest Guards of All Time] For all intents and purposes the jumper had become the most important part of the three point shot. The attempts are gone but the skill is what is shaping the NBA. Now at the latest turn the NBA has lost its way. Instead of further legitimizing the shooting guard as a primary playmaker on a team and in the game the game's greatest move has been to devalue him
