driving digital growth and helping brands connect with the next generation of customers. So how have millennials responded to the beauty industry? The beauty industry has reinvented itself to meet the needs of the millennial generation. It has become easier for brands to interact with and acquire high quality, data-driven information about millennials and their habits, because of the companies' creative use of software, mobile technologies, and digital media. However, millennials still rely heavily on influencers. They visit beauty sites once a month, and search for information about products once every two to three months. They are also seeking out digital tools to give them insights and access to personal recommendations in the retail space. Here are three important takeaways we learned about millennials and their approach to beauty. Bringing the Beauty Story to Life Millennials want to know what life is like for brands. They have looked to brands like Apple for inspiration and use of technology, because it gives them a more complete, engaging story than traditional media. Brands need to be more authentic and tell a story about themselves, while listening to what millennials are asking about the beauty business. Across all three of the big beauty companies - Estée Lauder, L'Oréal and Procter & Gamble - we're seeing different brands develop stories that speak to millennial consumers. At Estée Lauder, the brand is telling the story of what it means to be a woman today. L'Oréal offers a mission-based approach, with its "Be Bold Be You" campaign, while Procter & Gamble uses P&G's "Strong is Beautiful" campaign as a platform for telling the story of the larger brand. Companies are leaning on the millennial generation and their relationships with their peers to advance digital transformation. If brands do not innovate and transform, they will continue to lose customers. Organizations have changed their business models to provide better, more relevant digital content to customers. Technology companies such as Google and Amazon have made it possible for brands to better engage with customers and have personalized experiences. These companies have become an important pillar in the beauty industry and offer tools, data, and marketing expertise. Customer Experience

Evolution Millennials are less
