Regulation of NMDA glutamate receptor composition and the long-term modulation of spatial working memory by facilitation of synthesis and/or suppression of post-transcriptional processing of NR2B-containing NMDA receptors. Immediate excitatory synaptic transmission through N-methyl-D-aspartate glutamate receptors (NMDARs) is critical for the working memory function in the hippocampus. The NMDAR subunit composition of the receptor determines its properties, and several reports have demonstrated that the existence of NR2Bcontaining NMDARs is a necessary condition for the storage of spatial memory and for LTD induction. However, the mechanism underlying the spatial memory modulation is not fully understood. In this study, we investigated the mechanism underlying the roles of spatial memory modulation by NMDARs through post-transcriptional modifications. Changes in the expression and phosphorylation of NR2B, ERK, and PSD-95, and the consequent effects on the behavior of wild-type, NR1 KO, and NR2B KO mice were measured in d0c515b9f4
