Nov 22, 2017 - Browse other questions tagged ip-logger-shortener or ask your own question.A few months ago the Singapore Democratic Party (SDP) won our party election and we held our first party meeting. The party membership is quite small so I am sure we won't be growing as quickly as most other small parties. I have been on many election debates and I have attended many election night party meetings, so it is clear to me that we have quite a few large parties that will have to wither. There are some elements of what is going on in these elections that are worth noting. Perhaps there is more that can be done to reinforce our party among Singaporeans with these insights. 1. Singaporeans are actually bothered a little by opposition parties Singaporeans are actually pretty good about voting for opposition parties - even to the point where they say that opposition parties are not as bad as we think they are. This is despite the fact that there is one GRC (Constituency - don't let the term fool you; a GRC is more like a parliamentary region) in Singapore that is made up of a huge number of Singaporeans who are not actually members of any party at all. I have a few ideas about this one. For one, I think more targeted pre-primary education in schools for those that are struggling with the process is necessary. I would also be willing to make more debates available to more non-parties and I would be open to let the MSM run one or more election debates of our own. 2. The gap between PM Lee and the ruling party is huge Take a moment to look at the various polls and think about it. The level of support for the ruling party to be any degree of popular is somewhere around 4-5%. PM Lee personally is at probably around 8%. What of the rest of the ruling party? Let's be real. They are a large part of the reason the ruling party exists. How do they justify being there? They have all sorts of reason to be: a) The advantage of having more numbers - having a bigger footprint seems to give them an advantage in the mind
